The Historical Novel

Comments on Its Use in Schools

The teacher who wishes to make use of the historical novel as an aid in the teaching process finds that the field of choice is wide, and almost bewildering in its variety. The teacher who wishes to give competent guidance to his students may find the following questions arising in his mind: Which are the best novels? Which are in the large true to history? Which are fitted to the adolescent age? Which are objectionable by reason of their subject-matter or moral tone or method of presentation? Teachers who are faced by this practical problem and who find little time for personal exploration of this interesting field will welcome any aid in the matter of selection.

The writer is glad to preface a word of introduction to the list of novels which follows. The field is so largely unexplored by the critics in an intensive way, and by history teachers as well, that a carefully prepared list is sure to be of service. The lists which have been previously published are of definite value, especially such annotated lists as those of Baker¹ and of Kaye.² However, these lists are made with the tastes of the general reader in mind, or from the literary rather than the historical viewpoint. Their evaluations are not from the angle of the teacher, and there is little reference to the adaptability of the books which are listed to the immature, but developing mind of the high school student. Some of the historical novels which are confessedly the greatest in the judgment of the man of letters or the historian are rather strong meat for boys and girls.

The list is the natural outcome of the day by day activities and experience of the compiler. The teaching profession owes much to the librarians who by their painstaking work and sympathetic aid have made possible the systematic work which is being done in the various fields of academic work and scholarly investigation. The compiler is an experienced librarian and has had unusual experience with the students of high school age. The study room of the University High School is also the library and the latter aspect is emphasized rather than the former. While silence and good order prevail, the room has the atmosphere of mutual helpfulness rather than that of formal discipline. The librarian is looked upon by the students as their counselor and adviser and, moreover, is called upon to direct their voluntary reading both in the English and social science courses. In this capacity she has unusual opportunity to study the tastes of the students as they are manifested during the period of adolescence. The user of this list will find the experience of the librarian reflected in the notations subscribed under the titles, and in the symbols which indicate the usability of the various books.

The list has developed in connection with the work in the social sciences in the University High School. It embodies the results of experience in handling the matter of discursive reading. In connection with the training in organization of material based upon required reading and study, there is a large field of voluntary reading which it is the policy of the department to open up to the students. In this way it is possible to make use of material which is particularly adapted to stir the interest of the growing boy and girl by way of illustration and example. In the course in Community Life, which unit occupies the freshman year, short stories and sketches of present-day life are used for this purpose.³ In the course for the sophomores in the Survey of Civilization, which covers the chief features of world progress, the historical novel has been requisitioned as an aid in giving the students background and atmosphere.⁴ The reading is voluntary in the sense that the students are allowed a wide latitude of choice, and also in the fact that many read beyond the moderate requirements as to number of pages.

It might be of interest to the users of this list for the writer to make brief comments on the methods of handling this material and of accounting or checking up on the results. The students understand that credit is given for reading in this field, and that they are expected to report on this reading, make record of their impressions of each book, and keep track of the amount of their reading. The reading is selected from carefully prepared lists, arranged according to the period treated, which lists are posted in library and recitation room. In these the evaluation is according to the historical quality of the book in question, together with other obvious criteria such as those suggested in the first paragraph of this article. The novels are placed on a reserve shelf in the library, separated from the reserve shelves for the required reading. The plan is to keep a rather large assortment on the shelf, but to change the aspect of the shelves as the course advances, and as new periods and movements come above the historical horizon of the student. In this connection, the librarian has constant opportunity to consult with the students in regard to their reading, and to become acquainted with their tastes and limitations, as well as their reaction to particular books. In the list herewith given to the public will be found the results of the knowledge gained by intimate association with the students and study of the reading situation from various angles.

At this point the following questions may be raised: Why use the historical novel at all in a history course? Why not use material which is strictly historical? These questions suggest the attitude of the trained historian, of the historical teacher who is dealing with advanced students. The educator and the psychologist will answer that these objections do not hold for the immature mind, for the developing boy and girl of the adolescent age. The child has not formed canons of probability. He views all with open mind and sees with the eye of wonder. This attitude it is wise to cherish, and to guide wisely, for sophistication will proceed rapidly enough. If the imagination of the child has been fed on folklore and the stories of the heroes and the great epical narratives, he will not need any introduction to history. The child less fortunately placed will find the sense of reality in the past through the reading of the great chroniclers and romancers. For him Herodotus and Scott are alike friends and guides, portals to the realm of romance which for him is the realm of history. Thus the race story may lose the alien quality which it possesses for some, and may come to be "my story," in the consciousness of the student.

For many students the facts of the past as they are gathered from textbooks remain abstract, dry and lifeless. Unless the student comes to visualize the past, unless it comes to have reality in his mind, the lessons which history teaches are largely lost to him. The skillful teacher or the student gifted with imagination may not need any aids, and for these the devices of method and material are not so necessary. But with the average teacher in the average school, there can be little doubt that the historical novel may become a great aid to the effective teaching of history. The hard worked teacher who has not the time to build up a technique of illustration, will find helpers in the masters of imaginative fiction. These writers, by giving background and atmosphere to the facts of history, may contribute to the work of the teacher. While from the individual standpoint, this type of reading does not appeal to some, there are others for whom it becomes a gateway to historical interests and historical knowledge.

For the benefit of teachers, it might be well to give a somewhat more detailed account of the technique used in handling this material. As stated previously, it is the custom to post approved lists of historical novels which are useful as illustrative material in connection with class work. The lists include those books which are well written from the literary point of view, which are true to history in the large sense, and have some appeal to the adolescent age. They offer a wide latitude of choice, and yet furnish the needed guidance to the student in a field which is largely unknown to him. The wide option gives the student the opportunity to exercise his individual tastes and preferences, and gives that sense of adventure which is lacking in required reading. The books are listed topically under the headings corresponding to the basic units which comprise the course in the Survey of Civilization, and by this arrangement it is possible for the student to correlate his reading directly with his class work, if he so desires. Thus, as the course progresses, he may follow the fortunes of his heroes in an imaginative setting, so that they cease to be lay figures and become men of flesh and blood.

It will be seen from the above that the reading is in its essence voluntary, as distinct from what is called required reading, in that there is a specific assignment of chapters or pages, which are to be covered within a specified period of time. The student may be expected to read a specified number of books, although the wisdom of such a requirement may be open to question, but he is free to choose as to just what titles he shall select for himself. It is also discursive reading, not in the sense that it is desultory, but in the sense that it allows a wide range of choice. The more mature student may read with profit Hammerling's Aspasia or Ebers' The Emperor, while the immature boy may prefer and get profit from the historical stories of Alfred J. Church or even those of Henty. Some of the students who read widely may stray into the bypaths of history to advantage, and become acquainted with some of the by-products of the historical process.

It should also be noted that the lists posted are not looked upon as closed lists, but as open to amendment and change. In fact, the better students voluntarily read beyond the boundaries of the lists and record their impressions of the books read for the benefit of the teacher and the class work. In addition, it is the practice of the teacher to assign the more recent novels to discriminating students for a special report. I have found that students even after completing the course continue this reading voluntarily, and hand me their impressions of novels which they have discovered, or new ones which they have just read. For example, a boy who had the course in Survey of Civilization several years since, and who is now in my junior college class, has this year handed me the titles of several novels, which he thinks should be added to the list.

In motivating this reading, it is the practice to give the students credit for all books read, and to expect some form of report on each book, embodying the impressions of the reader as to the quality and value of the book. The report is best written immediately upon completing the reading of the book, as the most valuable impressions are evanescent and soon forgotten. It should include some idea of the plot, comment on the interest of the story, the relation of the book to the course or the unit in hand, the opinion of the student as to the value of the book, and any general reflections which he may be interested to record. The class is urged to make these reports perfectly frank statements and to give their spontaneous reactions to the book in hand, and hence it is thought best not to urge too close adherence to any set form for reporting. The report should be brief and to the point, the custom in the department being to use cards, size 4x6 inches, a size larger than the cards used in the card catalogues of libraries. These cards may be kept in filing cabinets or in boxes, and consulted to advantage in advising students.

Through this method of accounting, the student may be gradually led to make his reading educative, and not a mere relaxation or way of killing time. The requirement of a report is apt to make for more attentive reading, and reading with a purpose. Moreover, the significance of the reading begins to dawn on the reader as he continues to read and to make his reports. The personal contribution of the reader to the class work may be emphasized by reading aloud to the class the best of these reports, or reports on unusual books or on those outside the lists. It may be advisable at times to post the list of best readers with the amounts read, and some example of the reports written.

It is the practice by class discussion to correlate this reading informally with the regular class work. At frequent intervals, the teacher starts the recitation with a random question as to books read, or with a leading question in regard to some particular book. This may lead to a valuable ten-minute discussion of the picture of the tournament in "Ivanhoe," or of the conference between Richard and Saladin in the "Talisman." Familiarity with the literature is of great value to the teacher in leading the discussion, and such familiarity will rapidly increase by practice, in the case of the wide-awake teacher.

These discussions may be used as an educational influence in broadening the outlook of the students. They also furnish an agency in teaching historical mindedness; as the relations of fact and fancy are sure to come to the front. The thoughtful teacher will use them to call the attention of the class to the importance of making distinctions between what is true and what may be imagined to have taken place under actual conditions.

It may be noted in passing that this material should not be confused with the text and reference books, but should be placed in a position where it may stand on its own feet, in a corner of the library room and on shelves away from the reference shelves, which are associated in the mind of the student with the getting of lessons. Here, possibly with the guidance list at hand, it may be allowed to shift for itself, with the conviction that the students in search of recreation will find their way to these shelves and to an acquaintance with their riches.

Moreover, it is not the practice to introduce this material into the classroom recitation or to confuse the realms of fact and imagination. In the recitation, the chief objective is to represent the event as it actually occurred, in its circumstantial aspect, and with all the earmarks of reality. In this way history may at times introduce the child somewhat roughly to the facts, and he is apt to find instruction in knocking against the sharp corners of the world of reality, as it is seen reflected in history. By this procedure he becomes conscious in the most salutary way, that history is not a pleasant excursion, but a struggle or contest involving all the powers of the actors. Thus the natural and wholesome romantic tendencies of youth may be cultivated by the reading of the masterpieces of imaginative fiction, and corrected wherever guidance is necessary by the procedure in the classroom.

While it may be difficult to interest some of the students in this type of reading, it is also found that others may indulge to excess in reading of the story type, to the neglect of the more serious historical reading. By the plan of checking up the reading, both types of student may be watched and warned. The teacher keeps an eye on the situation, and offers suggestions whenever he thinks it advisable. In some cases, he may see fit to check any undue enthusiasm or indulgence, and in general to keep the activities of the students as well balanced as possible.

In conclusion, it should be stated that while some students are not interested in this reading, and some may read to the disadvantage of their more serious reading, there seems to be a very tangible service rendered to others in arousing an interest in history. It is clear from experience that some students gain their first interest in history through this avenue, and it should be added that the level of achievement in class work has been raised indirectly by the stimulus received from this reading. It is also clear that students thereby establish a permanent interest in a line of reading which may become the resource of leisure hours, and may, in time, give them a background such as professional students of history sometimes do not possess.

the comb-makers' and comb-tuners' art ; the little cylinders were set up so as to make the best possible use of the combs.

Improvements in the construction of these little movements called for highly-skilled craftsmen, specialists in their own particular line, and thus separate men made different parts, piercers, pin-makers, comb-cutters, wheel-cutters and mounters, cylinder prickers and finishers, etc. It was the practice in the St. Croix district to employ outdoor workers, and these workers often had their own small workshops attached—as we know in fact they were—to their own homes, where the separate parts were made, jobs finished and afterwards assembled in a finishing shop.

The first musical box factory in St. Croix was not built until 1875. Even after that date many people continued to work in their own homes. This practice of course lowered the cost of production considerably, and the instruments could be sold cheaper, and thus more people were able to purchase them. Thus it is that St. Croix became the centre of the cheaper class of musical boxes. Although some better-class ones were at times produced there, their aim at this period was to produce a cheaper machine than was being made in Geneva. The small cylinders were marked or pricked by a musician in one house, and the holes to receive the pins were drilled usually by girls, in another house, and afterwards the actual pinning was done by girls (or at times by children) in the homes. The cylinder was afterwards sealed and shaved at yet another house.

In St. Croix this outdoor worker system was in vogue for many years, and the trade or craft was passed from father to son. Remarkable as it may seem, it is nevertheless a fact that some of these outdoor workers never saw the finished movement. I believe the same conditions obtain to-day in St. Croix, with regard to the little movements produced by Messrs. Thorens.

Many fancy articles such as coloured tin boxes with a view printed on the lid, dolls, workboxes, jewel cases, etc., were produced, both in Switzerland and France. Competition was keen, as may be expected in any flourishing business. At first the French manufacturers of fancy articles would purchase the little movements from the Swiss ; this went on for some years, but in due course movements of good quality were made in Paris. In after years the French also made the larger type of musical box. The articles and toys containing the small movements seem to have been intended chiefly for the tourist in after years, and were

Musical calendar clock. Made by Rowley for the Indian market. It is called a bracket clock from its shape, but it was intended to be stood on a table or pedestal, as it measures 4 ft. 8 ins. high, 3 ft. wide and 22 ins. deep. The Nicole Frères four-overture musical box plays every three hours. Clock chimes on eight bells.

Illustration kindly lent by Messrs Rowley.

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR THE SOCIAL STUDIES IS
THE DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL STUDIES OF THE NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION

It was organized in 1921 for the purposes of uniting the efforts of those who are developing the teaching of history and the other social studies in the schools.

Its journal is The Historical Outlook, formerly The History Teacher's Magazine, the only professional journal devoted wholly to this field of teaching. (Address, 1623 Ranstead Street, Philadelphia.)

It provides two annual meetings, one at the time of the convention of the Department of Superintendence of the National Education Association and the other at the July convention of the parent association.

Its policies are guided by a Board of Directors composed of representatives from fifteen associations of teachers, school administrators and university professors.

Its officers for 1926-1927 are the following:

President, B. L. Pierce, University of Iowa.

Vice-President, R. O. Hughes, Peabody High School, Pittsburgh.

Secretary-Treasurer, Edgar Dawson, Hunter College, New York City.

Corresponding Secretary, M. V. Carney, Central High School, St. Paul.

Chairman of the Board of Directors, H. C. Hill, University of Chicago.

Annual dues are $2.25, which includes subscription to The Historical Outlook. Inquiries should be addressed to the Secretary, Edgar Dawson, Hunter College, New York City.
